

Dear Ma'am or Sir,

From the proceeding referenced on the cover sheet, I have learned that the FCC is considering implementing a nationwide call privacy law. I live in Indiana, which already has a call privacy law. The proposed FCC ruling would result in a lower level of protection for me and my family from unwanted calls and solicitations. The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. To implement a base standard for all states would be a good thing, but to remove higher protections from laws that some states have already passed would be a bad thing. Since Indiana implemented the telephone privacy law, our household has gone from receiving two to three solicitations each night, to one a month! We love this law! We can finally enjoy dinner in peace. We are no longer wakened early on weekends with unwanted calls. I think it is important that there be a national standard for telephone privacy, but I also believe that the national standard should allow for states to have higher levels of protection for their citizens. Please modify the current proposal to allow Indiana to retain the current level of protection offered by our Telephone Privacy law.

Thank You,

Adam Jones
